

Investing For Children's Future — Proof of Work

AMFI-Registered Mutual Fund Distributor

Voice Card

Direct, plain-spoken, verifiable. Name what someone is losing, without softening it. Use everyday words, even if they repeat. Calm fear by pointing to where a parent can check the facts themselves — SEBI-regulated, performance data on AMFI and AMC websites — not by asking them to just trust me.

Proof Statement

I help parents who don't know where to start investing for their child's future understand mutual funds in plain language — through a free children's financial literacy guide that walks them from confusion to their first step, and ends with them booking a consultation call with me.

One person: a parent who hasn't started investing specifically for their child, and doesn't know where to start.

One action: book a consultation call.

Why this needs to exist

A business card can say “Mutual Fund Distributor.” It can't show you how I actually explain things. This guide can. Read it, and you'll know if I can make this simple for you — before you ever talk to me.

The Project

Problem

Most parents I work with aren't choosing FDs or gold over mutual funds — they're not choosing anything at all. There's no habit of investing specifically for a child from an early age. Years of managing client investments showed me this directly: hardly a few were investing in their child's name. Meanwhile the costs that hit at 18 — higher education, starting a business, marriage, even a laptop or phone — keep rising, and most parents don't connect that future cost to a decision they could make today.

What I did and decided

Built a free guide, sequenced deliberately: why early investing matters, a simple four-column comparison, the corpus at 18, the point made plainly, then children's-specific mutual funds — schemes labelled Scheme 1, Scheme 2, not named, so the guide stays educational, not a sales pitch. Risk profiling and specific recommendations stay for the call, not the guide: the guide explains the why, the call works out the what. The first draft was framed around general family planning. On review, it was too wide and off the point. I rebuilt it narrower, for the child specifically.

What came of it

Small, but real. A few parents who saw an early version said, plainly, that they regretted not knowing this sooner. One close friend, after this same reasoning, invested in his daughter's name that week. That's what gave me the confidence to build this further.

What I'd do differently

Start with the child-specific framing from day one, instead of beginning broad and correcting later.

Sitemap — Framed Cases

1. Landing Page

Problem: A parent has probably saved something for their child, but hasn't invested for them specifically.

Decision: Lead with the claim, not the credential. AMFI registration appears as a trust marker below the headline, not as the headline itself.

Result: A parent who recognises the gap wants the guide.

Most parents save for their child. Very few actually invest for them — starting early, specifically in their name. That gap is what costs the most by the time they turn 18.

I'm an AMFI-registered Mutual Fund Distributor. I put together a free guide that walks you through why starting early matters, and what your first step could look like.

2. Confirmation State

Problem: A parent who just submitted their contact details has no signal anything happened.

Decision: One line, immediate, no detour.

Result: Closes the loop before the parent leaves the page.

Sent. Check your WhatsApp or email — your guide's on its way.

3. The Guide

Problem: Parents don't know where to start, and no one makes the cost of waiting real, in numbers they can check.

Decision: Sequence: why early investing matters, a four-column comparison (no investment / SIP from age 3 / 13 / 15), corpus at 18, the point stated plainly, then children's-specific mutual funds, schemes unnamed. Return figures use an illustrative 12% p.a. assumption — a common industry convention for long-term equity SIPs, not a SEBI-set figure — with the standard market-risk disclaimer shown directly beneath the numbers.

Result: The guide ends with a direct link to the booking page.

This guide explains the why. The call is where we figure out the what — specific to your child, your goals, and how much risk you're comfortable with.

4. Book a Call Page

Problem: Not every visitor read the guide first. Some arrive cold, with no context.

Decision: Built for both. Guide-readers get a low-friction calendar. Cold arrivals get a short claim and the AMFI credential, so the page can stand alone.

Result: One page, two entry points, one action.

I help parents who haven't started investing for their child yet understand mutual funds in plain language, and take a first step. On this call, we'll look at your goals for your child, what you're comfortable with in terms of risk, and what starting point makes sense for you.

Before / After

Generic:

As a results-driven and passionate Mutual Fund Distributor, I am dedicated to empowering families with dynamic financial solutions for a brighter future.

Edited:

Most parents save for their child. Very few actually invest for them, and that gap is what costs the most by the time they turn 18.

The generic line describes a category of professional and could sit on anyone's profile. The edited line names the specific gap as a loss the reader is already living with, and is checkable against the reader's own situation immediately.
