

1) My Proof Statement:

I help parents who don't know where to start investing for their child's future understand mutual funds in plain language — through a free children's financial literacy guide that walks them from confusion to their first step, and ends with them booking a consultation call with me.

2) Why this needs to exist:

A CV or LinkedIn can say "Mutual Fund Distributor" — it can't show a confused parent that I can actually make investing simple and non-scary enough for them to trust me with their child's money.

3) Claude Project and Custom Instructions (Screenshot) Project Name: Child Investing Portfolio Build

4) Sitemap

1. Landing page — states my claim, includes AMFI credential, CTA to download guide
2. Guide opt-in page — parent enters email/WhatsApp, receives the guide
3. Book a call page — final action

5) Discussion on Site Map with Claude

Child Investing Portfolio Build / Validating a financial literacy sales funnel

Free plan · Upgrade

Share

That's not necessarily wrong — it's a legitimate "value-first" structure — but it means two things have to be true, and neither is currently designed:

1. The guide itself must end with a direct link to your book-a-call page. Not "reach out to me" — an actual button/URL, because that link is functionally your entire homepage-to-booking journey. If that link is weak or buried, this whole sitemap fails regardless of how good your landing page copy is.
2. You need a delivery-confirmation moment — even a single line of text after opt-in ("check WhatsApp/email — your guide's on its way") — so the parent isn't left wondering if it worked. Right now that state doesn't exist anywhere in your sitemap.

Verdict on your three questions:

- Does it walk one person from landing → believing → acting? No — it walks them from landing to opt-in, then exits your site entirely, and hopes the guide brings them back. That's a real gap, not a stylistic one.
- Does it prove your claim? Not on-site. The proof is 100% outsourced to the guide. Which means this sitemap review is incomplete until we've stress-tested the guide's structure too — that's the actual proof engine, not these three pages.
- What's wasted? The two-page landing/opt-in split, unless you can name a reason for it.

Before I help you build any copy: do you want the opt-in form merged into the landing page, or is there a deliberate reason you're keeping them separate?

Write a message...

+  Sonnet 5 Medium

Claude is AI and can make mistakes. Please double-check responses.

Last Paragraph from the Claude's response:

Verdict on your three questions:

- Does it walk one person from landing → believing → acting? No — it walks them from landing to opt-in, then exits your site entirely, and hopes the guide brings them back. That's a real gap, not a stylistic one.
- Does it prove your claim? Not on-site. The proof is 100% outsourced to the guide. Which means this sitemap review is incomplete until we've stress-tested the guide's structure too — that's the actual proof engine, not these three pages.
- What's wasted? The two-page landing/opt-in split, unless you can name a reason for it.